Are Helicopter Parents Caring Too Much?

Parents tagging along on their adult child's job interview or arguing about grades with their offspring's professor ... you are kidding, right?

Actually, no. Helicopter parents hover – hence the name – and through their hovering become way too involved in their child's path to adulthood. Moreover, while their intentions are good, the results mostly are not. In a recent study out of Macquarie University in Australia, researchers found that children with helicopter parents were more likely to be anxious.

The study's leader, quoted in an ABC News in Science report, commented, "We found that children who show signs of anxiety and who are inhibited (such as being unwilling to talk or reluctant to explore new situations) as preschoolers are more likely to have mothers who help too much."

Helicoptering usually continues, as children get older. An early study by researchers at Michigan State University found that 31% of companies had received a résumé submitted by a parent for his or her adult child.

Margaret Fiester of the Society for Human Resource Management points out that such intervention "definitely does not show great leadership or decision-making skills." In addition, most adult children do not like it: One college student reportedly applied for and received a restraining order against her helicopter parents.

Yes, parents should protect and care for their kids – it is far better than the alternative – but experts do not think overdoing it is good either. Most believe Mom and Dad should probably land the helicopter now ... for everyone's sake.

Reports Trace the History of Your Home-to-Be

A house is probably the biggest purchase you'll make. So finding out all you can about the home-to-be is essential.

It's all about the history of your home, and several companies have sprung up across North America to enlighten potential buyers as they begin their home search.

These organizations provide inexpensive reports that include a history of the home dating back years.

That means you can find out about additions and repairs through building permits and leaky roofs via insurance claims.

Previous selling prices and even some of the more unsavory aspects of the home, such as a history as a drug lab, are available.

Some firms also will provide names of the companies that made previous additions (such as swimming pools), so you can follow up if you like the workmanship, or if you don't.

In the U.S., one company offering this service is BuildFax; buyers can obtain a report through their real estate agent. However, if you have time and energy, you can also conduct searches yourself; virtually all the information is contained in official records, available to the public at little or no cost.

History reports like these can help potential buyers avoid unpleasant surprises at closing time or later down the road.

A track record of problems might make a house a lot more expensive to insure, but if a potential buyer knows about the issues before purchasing, he or she could decide against buying the home or at the very least will be prepared for the additional costs.

Bringing Back Outdoor Play ... for Our Kids' Sake

Sadly, the phrase "Can Johnny come out to play?" is from another era. Parents rarely hear their kids' friends asking their buddies to come outside to play. Kids aren't really playing outdoors anymore. Today's children are spending an average of 7.5 hours a day watching TV, playing video games, and using the computer and other devices.

U.K. child psychologist Dr. Richard Woolfson has noted a dramatic decline in play patterns in recent years. "Whereas energetic free play outdoors used to be the typical activity in childhood, such opportunities are rare now, largely because of parental fears about their child's safety," he says.

Dr. Woolfson's point goes a long way toward explaining why kids seldom play outside anymore. Increased crime rates and bullying statistics mean parents are hesitant to allow their children to play outdoors unsupervised. Work-burdened parents also find they don't really have time to monitor their children, so it's no wonder outside play is going the way of the dodo.

Dr. Pooja Tandon of the Seattle Children's Research Institute stresses the need for kids to spend time outdoors. She points out that this time encourages increased creativity and the development of strong social skills. It's also important to a child's cognitive and emotional development.

Meanwhile, play participation rates are dismal: One in four children doesn't participate in any free-time physical activity. Is it time to bring play back? Check out Dr. Tandon's YouTube video on preschoolers and outdoor play at www.tinyurl.com/aqm7ery

Slate.com

You don't need to send your kids to preschool for them to succeed. Essentially suggesting that preschool is more valuable for disadvantaged kids – preschool gives them the kind of contact with adults that kids who aren't disadvantaged have as a matter of course – Moyer believes children with advantages have one main thing going for them: their vocabulary. They're exposed to many more words than their less fortunate counterparts. So if you really want to prepare your child for school, skip preschool and grab a book.

Bring Home 2013 Design Trends This Spring

Spring has sprung, the grass has riz ... I wonder where the plumber is.

This riff on the poem, “Spring in the Bronx,” highlights other rites of the season: renovating and redecorating.

There’s nothing quite like sunlight pouring through our open curtains to inspire us, so every year at this time we start to think about changing our surroundings.

Spring’s latest trends may be just the thing to bring new life to your old home.

Moreover, because it’s even more important if you’re thinking about selling, you’ll be pleased to know there are some inexpensive quick fixes to brighten your surroundings.

This year is all about color: Pastels are everywhere (Benjamin Moore’s color of 2013 is called Lemon Sorbet), but so are muted blues, which have been proclaimed the new neutrals.

Pastels are a great way to lighten and brighten without dominating. For the potential seller, an accent wall in soft yellow complements neutrals and won’t turn off buyers.

While summer is still months away, bring the look of the outdoors in now. Let garden furniture assume center stage, and introduce the sunshine with sheer window coverings; it’s the best way to establish a link with nature.

This year, we’re reacting to our high-tech lifestyles by connecting to all things earthy.

A “new” traditional style features classic with a twist, such as a sofa with simple lines upholstered in a strong color.

It’s a sea change from last year’s whimsical folk art and reclaimed furniture look, which nevertheless remains popular this year.

If you need new appliances, there’s a big surprise in store. Black is the new stainless steel, and even white is trending.

Lastly, you can give your home curb appeal with new door hardware in the latest metallics: brass, copper, bronze or gold. Don’t forget to paint the door in one of the new colors. Then sit back and enjoy the compliments.

Craving an Out-of-This-World Vacation?

If you’re looking for an out-of-this-world-vacation, you might be able to do just that ... literally! Astronomers have discovered what could be another Earth.

They have been studying five planets orbiting a star called Tau Ceti, similar to the Sun. If these planets are really there, one of them is roughly the correct distance from the star to host life, oceans and mild temperatures.

But don’t book time off work just yet the discovery still needs to be confirmed.

Astronomer Mikko Tuomi at the University of Hertfordshire in the U.K. and his colleagues looked at more than 6,000 different observations of Tau Ceti from telescopes around the world. They believe small changes in the way Tau Ceti moves in space could be caused by gravitational tugs from these five planets.

Only one of the five planets (about four times as big as Earth) could host life. The others are too close to Tau Ceti.

As a resident of this new Earth, you’d see a bright yellow sun in the sky, but your year would be much shorter – only 168 days.

Smarties Makers Got It Right After All

Concerned your guests may not like your special blend of hot chocolate? Try serving it in a red or orange cup.

According to a recent study in the Journal of Sensory Studies, people believed their hot chocolate had a more intense flavor when they drank it from a red or orange mug.

Apparently we identify certain colors with the characteristics of certain foods, suggests lead researcher Betina

Piqueras-Fiszman, and people associate red with sweet things.

Brown packaging signals to coffee drinkers that inside they’ll find a strong brew. And what about that important question “When you eat your Smarties, do you eat the red ones last?”

Would the old jingle be as memorable if you ate the yellow ones last?

Ask the Agent: This Month’s Question

What do I need to do to sell my home this spring?

Are you putting your house on the market this spring? Be ready to grab a vacuum and basic toolkit.

Keeping your home well maintained and clean may be more effective – and economical – than attempting costly renovations.

So, mow the lawn, trim the bushes, and weed the garden. Bring the spring weather inside with quality flower arrangements at the front entrance.

Paint your walls in neutral colors; it will make rooms look brighter, and it will be easier for new owners to paint over if they choose.

Put out fresh guest towels for tours by potential buyers, and keep your home clutter-free.

Some people hire professional cleaners to come regularly while their home is on the market, while others rent storage space. Hold a garage sale. Just remember to store your sale items behind closed doors during viewings.

Recipe: Parsley-Crusted Roast Beef

This easy family favorite serves 4-6 people.

1 (2 to 2 ½ pound) boneless rump roast

1 teaspoon celery salt

1 teaspoon garlic salt

Salt and pepper

1 bunch parsley, finely chopped

Directions

Preheat oven to 325 degrees.

Sprinkle celery salt, garlic salt, salt and pepper all over the beef and rub in.

Firmly pat the chopped parsley all over the meat so that it sticks and forms a crust on the roast.

Put the prepared roast in a lightly greased roasting pan and place in the oven.

Roast for approximately 20 minutes per pound or until a meat thermometer reads 135-145 degrees.

Remove from the oven and allow the meat to rest for 5-10 minutes.

Slice and serve with your favorite sides.
